harbor, is a rock in whose outlines is portrayed with remarkable exactness the profile of a human face. The rock is some fifty feet in height and it extends well out over the water. At covered by the renewned explorer whose name it bears, there is a twenty-four foot rise and fall of tide. When at full tide or approaching it the water ebbs and flows through the aperture in the rock, which is probably four by seven feet in dimensions.

So far is known this great rock face was never photographed until last September, when it fell within the range of the camera of George R. Tingle, jr., an artist of merit, and until recently a student at the University of Virginia. Mr. Tingle is the son of George R. Tingle, who, during President Cleveland's last administration, was a special treasury agent in charge of the Seal

The future of the horse as a factor in the large utilities of our civilization, so far as the signs of the times are an indication, seems destined to be a brief one. There is too much inherited affection for this noble animal, says the Boston Transcript, to make his complete banishment probable, even after there ceases to be a necessity for that service which in the past has been so large and so splendid a part of the world's history. We shall doubtless continue to employ the accepted average of his strength as a convenient and conventional measurement of new forces, and autotrucks and automobiles and all the other self-moving agencies will have their potentialities expressed in terms of horse-power, but they will become as impersonal as metres and hecto-

A DOUBLE BARRELED CANNON. The old double-barreled cannon of the Mitchell Thunderbolts is now owned by the city of Athens, Ga., and is on the city hall lot. Captain Barnett has been instructed to have the cannon mounted at the head of the park near the confederate monument. A history of unique interest about this old cannon is related by the Athens Banner. In the first place, it is the only double-barreled cannon in the world. In the next place, it was invented with a peculiar idea in the mind of the inventor. It belonged to the Mitchell Thunderbolts, a company of old men organized here in 1863 purely for home defense. One of the company, Mr. John Gilleland, invented this cannon and had it cast at the Athens foundry. The idea of Mr. Gilleland was one of considerable ingenuity. A fifty-foot chain, with the ends attached to two cannon balls. was the charge, and the idea of the inventor was that when the cannon balls came out of the muzzle of the cannon they would have Neb. Athens one day to test it. It was properly charged and was touched off with great ceremony. One of the balls got a little ahead of the other, and then the mischief was to pay. It had a kind of circular motion, and plowed up about a quarter of an acre of ground, the members of the company in the meantime scattering in all direc-

> The old cannon was never used after that except at an occasional democratic jubilea when charges of powder would be fired. About five years ago the old cannon disappeared and not until a few days ago did our people know where it was. Last week it turned up in a junk shop, but it was promptly purchased by the city. Mr. Neumyer, who owned the cannon, had been offered $50 for it, but when he learned that it was a rare old relic and our people wanted to keep it, he promptly turned down the offer and traded it to the city for an old bell.

Perhaps a good many people would prefer to see what is an undoubted advance portation launched under different auspices, but be its origin what it may, it is destined to be the rapidly developing industry of the near future.
